The rock fortress is the innermost stronghold of the 70 hectare fortified town, executed daringly on a stupendous scale; it prompts one to marvel at the creative vision that was behind this structure. The summit of this rock was the unlikely setting for a courtly paradise of elegant pavilions, amid water gardens and pools, all perched 600 feet above the surrounding jungle. The two enormous artfully sculpted lion paws are all that remains of the giant recumbent lion to which the rock was transformed into, giving the rock its name.

Painted under an overhanging rock, of the original 500 or so frescoes which vie with those in Ajanta in Western India, only 21 remain. The figures are portraits of 'Apsaras' (celestial nymphs) and attendants above clouds, offering flowers, scattering petals or bathing.
